Israel Reassures U.S. Aides On Peaceful Purposes Of Reactor

The United States has quietly reinspected a closely guarded Israeli atomic power plant and affirmed its tentative conclusion that the plant was not being used for making atomic weapons.

The inspection, which took place recently, was the third by Atomic Energy Commission engineers to the Dimona plant in the Negev near Beersheba. Because of the plant's capability of producing plutonium, which is used in the manufacture of atomic bombs, writes John W. Finney, in the New York Times, Dimona has become a center of considerable controversy and anxiety in the Middle East.

It is largely to reassure the United States that the plant is being used for peaceful purposes that the Israelis have allowed the American engineers to visit the reactor, which normally is off limits to foreigners.

While Israeli and American officials are reluctant to discuss the arrangement, it is becoming apparent that Israel, on an informal basis, is permitting inspection on an annual basis. The first inspection took place in the spring of 1964 and the second in February, 1965.

According to informed sources the American engineers, on the basis of their latest visit, came to the same tentative conclusion as a year ago, that the reactor is not being used at this time for producing plutonium for weapons.

The conclusion is tentative because it is difficult to establish in once-a-year inspections that none of the reactor fuel rods have been removed for extracting the plutonium produced during the operation of a reactor.

The Dimona reactor, built with French help and originally described to American officials as a textile plant, has been in power operation intermittently for more than a year. The 24,000-kilowatt plant is of the natural uranium, heavy-water moderated type that is particularly suited for producing plutonium, says the New York Times. If used for weapons purposes, the reactor is capable of producing enough uranium for about two relatively small atomic bombs a year.

At the insistence of the Israelis, the inspections are being carried out without publicity and are described as "visits." The arrangement is one that satisfies the Israelis but not completely the United States.

Through such an informal arrangement, Israel is able to reassure the United States that it is not producing an atomic bomb, and thus be assured of continued political and technical support. But the informality of the arrangement, with the lack of publicity about the results of the inspections, leaves the rest of the world uncertain as to the Israelis' use of the reactor.

This uncertainty fits into an Israeli strategy of keeping the Arab

Heads Of State Visit Latin Americans, And Africans, To Strengthen Economic Ties

The political and diplomatic officials who see Israel's leaders in and out of the country put in a strenuous day at Lydda Airport, when President Zalman Shazar left at 9.30 A.M. for state visits to four Latin-American countries, says James Feron, Jerusalem writer for the New York Times. Three hours later Premier Levi Eshkol returned from a tour of seven African states.

The greatest share of Israel's economic and social development programs is in Africa and Latin America and the busy schedule at Lydda only underlined the nation's continuing interest in strengthening these ties.

Both men expressed the need for Israel to maintain and strengthen the ties in their airport speeches. Although the links have been forged in the fields of agricultural development and youth training, they are important politically for Israel in her struggle against the surrounding Arab states.

The sensitive nature of this struggle was noted in the absence of any mention in Premier Eshkol's remarks of a brief stopover earlier at Teheran. The Israeli leader conferred for nearly an hour with Iranian Government leaders.

On his return Mr. Eshkol spoke of Israel as "an important element in the African consciousness" and said there was still scope to broaden the relationships. He visited a quarter of the 28 independent African nations that have economic ties with Israel.

Although three-quarters of Israel's technical assistance has been directed toward Africa, the Latin-American program has provided the greater challenge.

On the American continent Israel has been asked to provide assistance to countries whose traditional cultural ties have been with Spain and France, whose industrial and political atmosphere is often influenced by the United States and whose development is generally ahead of Israel's.

Permanent Israeli technical cooperation missions are working in Bolivia, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Costa Rica, Ecuador, El Salvador, Jamaica, Peru, Trinidad, and Venezuela, says the New York Times.

Israel accounts for forty per cent of Latin America's extracontinental training program. Since 1961 more than 1,500 Latin Americans have studied there.

Israel's programs in Latin America, like those in Africa, are based on small, highly specialized projects that have proved successful in Israel. One of these is comprehensive rural planning based on a system of small settlements clustered on a large urban development. The aim is to keep the young down on the farm by bringing the "city" to them.

"In Israel we prevented the establishment of the super-farm such as you find in the United States," an Israeli expert said in a recent interview, "and the Latin Americans who are breaking up their own big farms have found our experience useful to them."

"In Venezuela they are developing the Lachish system," he added, referring to a ten-year-old development project in the northern Negev where fifty-seven villages utilize the services of Kiryat Gat, the central city, but remain separated, even ethnically.

Israel had only eighty-eight experts in Latin America last year, but officials say the intention is to provide "show windows" in developing communal settlements or agricultural training centers for soldiers or seed farms for improved corn.

Israelis are working in arid zone development in Brazil and in the training of youth movements in Bolivia, Ecuador, and Costa Rica. Peru, Colombia, and Venezuela send army officers to Israel for courses.

The Gadna program in Israel, para-military training for youth aimed at developing an interest in the soil, has proved popular in Latin-American countries. One of President Shazar's tasks on his tour of Argentina, Brazil, Uruguay and Chile was to meet with the Jewish communities in each country, says the New York Times. Argentina has a community of 450,000 or sixty-two per cent of Latin-American Jews.

To Expand Yiddish Theatre, Foster New Writing

Two of the oldest Yiddish theatrical organizations, the Hebrew Actors Union and the Folksbiene, have joined forces to expand Yiddish theater activities. They will establish a Free Yiddish Theater for Senior Citizens in October as well as a center "to foster new, good writing for the Yiddish stage."

Performances will be given in neighborhood community centers, auditoriums, and recreation halls of new apartment house complexes. Sponsors will underwrite each performance. Yiddish translations of the best plays will be done, says the New York Times. The program also will include classics drawn from the works of Sholem Aleichem and I. L. Peretz, and musicals.

Funds will be sought from corporations, unions, Government agencies and foundations. The fund-raising committee is headed by Seymour Rexsite, president of the union, and S. Efron, educational director of the Workmen's Circle.

The union, the first of its kind to be organized in the U.S., was founded in 1890. During its heyday, the membership enrollment was 1,500 in the 1920's and early 1930's; it is now 250. At one time, there were 21 theaters in New York and on the road catering to Yiddish presentations.

The number of theaters has dwindled to the Anderson in Manhattan and the Borough Park in Brooklyn. According to Mr. Rexsite, it is planned to open two more houses — one in the Bronx and another in Manhattan.

The Folksbiene, cultural arm of the Workmen's Circle, has been performing plays since 1915. The circle is a fraternal group formed in 1900. It has a membership of 60,000 families in the United States and Canada.

Union Head Predicts Return Of Concerns To N.Y.; Better Days

New York's garment industry may soon enjoy a renaissance, despite its loss of 36,000 jobs in the last decade, according to a veteran of thirty-seven years of fights and feasts with management. Louis Stulberg, the new president of the giant International Ladies' Garment Workers Union, writes Isadore Barmash, of the New York Times, is convinced of the industry's bright future for two "good" reasons.

The lure of lower-wage, out-of-town sections, which compete with New York, will gradually disappear as Federal minimum wage increases push rates upward in those areas, he asserted.

And New York may soon have a production surge, if recent inquiries received by the union from manufacturers, seeking approval for a return to or an expansion within the city, represent the onset of a trend, Mr. Stulberg said.

In a broad-ranging interview, Mr. Stulberg, who succeeded David Dubinsky as president of the 450,000-member union on June 15, discussed the I.L.G.'s future relationship with New York's largest industry and with key apparel centers around the country.

He also offered an insight into the union's plans, which include pressing a demand for higher wages at the expiration of contracts in the dress, coat and suit, and sportswear industries in the first half of 1967.

California, the nation's second largest market, is "one of our problem areas," he said, and will receive a major organizing stress by the I.L.G.W.U. "The West Coast and the South are our two frontiers," he observed.

The South still represents the prime target, but progress has been made there, as well as in the newer manufacturing areas, such as New England and Pennsylvania. Nonetheless, the 64-year-old union chief, who was responsible for much of the organizational policy under Mr. Dubinsky, views the South as the single most important area for continuing organizing effort.

The process of continuing unionization remains the I.L.G.'s principal challenge "because in order to stand still, we must organize. This is the only way to keep up with the expansion of manufacturers, their losses and their movement from regular markets to the highways and by-ways of the country," Mr. Stulberg commented.

What of the industry's greatest need — the need to attract more production workers?

"I don't know that it is a function of a union to train workers," Mr. Stulberg replied to the New York Times writer. "Even the four-year to five-year apprenticeship practice in Europe is dying out. There is only one answer to the problem of attracting new workers — higher wages and improved factory conditions."

Distinguished N.Y. Rabbi To Return To London As Chief Rabbi

Dr. Immanuel Jakobovits, of the Fifth Avenue Synagogue, in New York, was reported to have been chosen as Chief Rabbi of Britain and the Commonwealth A committee under the chairmanship of Sir Isaac Wolfson was said to have made the choice unanimously, reports the New York Times. The forty-five-year-old Dr. Jakobovits is regarded as the right Rabbi for the outstanding Orthodox Jewish religious post in the world.

The position of Chief Rabbi has been vacant since the retirement of Dr. Israel Brodie in May, 1965.

The United Hebrew Congregations of Britain and the Commonwealth first offered the post to Dr. Yaacov Herzog, of Israel, who is a former Israeli Ambassador to Canada. He accepted but withdrew last September because of ill health.

Two other rabbis were seriously considered. They are Louis Rabinowitz, of Jerusalem; and Norman Lamm, of the Jewish Center, 131 West 86th Street, New York City.

The committee under Sir Isaac is believed to have sought a religious leader of undeviating Orthodox views. Orthodox Judaism in Britain has been rent by a schism in recent years, and the United Hebrew Congregations organization has rejected the man identified as the leading voice for change, Dr. Louis Jacobs.

Dr Jakobovits declined to comment on a report that he would be asked to become Chief Rabbi of Britain.

"I cannot say anything at this stage," he said. "From what I understand all reports are quite unofficial, certainly as far as I am concerned."

Dr. Jakobovits, who was born on February 8, 1921, in Königsberg, Germany, comes from a family in which there have been rabbis for four generations. In the 1930's the Jakobovits family went to England, where the future rabbi was educated. He received degrees from the University of London and Jews College in London.

Dr. Jakobovits served as religious leader of Brondesbury Synagogue, South East London Syna-

For The Welfare Of Children Who Fall Into Bad Ways There Is Something New

By Zehava Albert, in Israel Youth Horizon

When children between the ages of 11 and 13 repeatedly skip school, roam the streets, smoke, steal and pick pockets they are usually sent to institutions and reformatories. This has been the accepted method of tackling the problem.

Although this provides a disciplined framework and strict supervision, the emphasis seems to be on punishment that will deter them from any future lawbreaking. In some cases the young wrongdoer guilty of some petty crime may become worse after contact with the hardened delinquent he may meet at the institution.

It would seem that these institutions are created more for the protection of society from assaults on its property, rather than for the welfare of the "unfortunate" child.

I use the word "unfortunate" expressedly. Because most of these children are victims of circumstances disastrous to their sense of security.

Their family life cannot provide them with what they so urgently need in the psychological sense. This is one of the problems of an immigrant society such as ours where a fairly stable, patriarchal form of community life becomes disrupted when it is planted in the midst of a modern, western-styled society, demanding a certain standard of education and culture, and a different set of values.

The father of the family is no longer the paterfamilias in the old sense — generally instead of being an independent worker or merchant as he once was, he becomes an unskilled labourer. The families of these communities begin to feel their inferiority; that there are barriers they can never overcome.

The children begin to lose their regard for a father who often becomes a drunkard or a gambler. The mother may be too domineering, or overtired, since she, too, has to go out to work if the necessary standard of living is to be attained. Into the bargain the large family that she bears may become too much for her to cope with. Sometimes family life is broken up, and some types of children who are "difficult" for such parents, begin to feel unwanted and hence take to the streets as an outlet.

In Israel the authorities responsible for such children began to feel that placing them in institutions was not always the answer to the problem and began to seek more imaginative methods.

About two years ago, the Director of the Youth Authority of the Ministry of Social Welfare, Dr. Ze'ev Spanier, tried out a new experiment. He had come up against a situation where there were not sufficient places in institutions for the youth committed to his Authority and decided to open up a youth centre for them. With the help of youth leaders and social workers, the project was quite successful but could not be continued under the auspices of Youth Authority.

As the Probationary Service was interested in the project, some of the children were directed to a special youth club Dr. Spanier set up in the Baka quarter of Jerusalem. The children chosen were those who, Dr. Spanier felt, because of their circumstances and character, could adjust with proper care.

When the club was started just about one year ago, at first the atmosphere was bleak. It was seen that an attempt to organize them as a group, to take their meals together, and have a rota system of washing and cleaning up, could not succeed.

Instead, stocks of food were left in the kitchen so that the child could wander in as he pleased and help himself, washing his dishes at his own convenience. If he wished to engage in some form of activity such as handiwork or sports, he was free to do so. Individual spontaneity was what mattered.

For children who take to the streets as an escape from a confined framework such as a school or a family, there is something of a paradox in creating yet another one. Discussing this point with Mrs. Esther Bazak, a social worker attached to the Probationary Service, who is working with Dr. Spanier for the children of this club, she elucidated the inner reasoning of the scheme.

"True there is a paradox in the fact that dealing with children who mostly break away from the frameworks that contain them — school (generally one for disturbed children) and the home (failing to provide them with what they apparently need) — we offer them yet another closed framework.

"But we do not offer them a framework that hampers them. When the children first came they reminded one of the tough street children in films, with an I-couldn't-care-less air about them, flopping down here and there, both defiant and listless. Now the change is really remarkable."

The club has a completely "permissive" atmosphere. It is a substitute for the street and an appendage to the home.

Part of a solid-looking stone Arab house, it consists of a large room, kitchen, and tiny, low room barely the height of an average man, just above. The expansive grounds, dotted with olive trees and fringed with pines, which surround it, provide that sense of freedom and wide open spaces, which the children seem to crave.

There are twelve boys so that the atmosphere created is an intimate one. Coming every day from one to five o'clock, the boys gradually began to become attached not only to the youth leader, Haim Rokach (a law student at the Hebrew University) and Mrs. Bazak, but to each other.

Visiting the club recently, I could see that some drastic changes had taken place since it was first started. A programme of activities was pinned up on the wall and Haim Rokach, the youth leader, told me that the children had now reached a stage where they had themselves organized the programme of activities.

The club had also been provided with furniture, handicraft tools and sports equipment from "The Jerusalem Post Hanuka Toy Fund."

The attachment and trust which the children feel for the youth leader and social worker make it possible to introduce some discipline. This is administered very judiciously, that is to say that although the child does not now do exactly as he wishes, a reasonable request for a change of programme is generally permitted.

On the other hand, if a child insists on doing something which is against the overall decision, he has to be made to realize that he is doing wrong by some form of mild punishment, and this is usually successful. A sense of responsibility for the cleanliness and appearance of the place has also begun to blossom.

Of course it is not only the club itself which forms the total project. Mrs. Bazak's main work is with the parents, both to learn from them how the child is behaving, and also to explain to the parents what the authorities are doing for him.

If the parent should declare that the child practically belongs to her, why not take him all together, it is for Mrs. Bazak to point out patiently that her role is to help the mother (who is not in a position to give the child all that he requires) not to replace her.

In addition to home visits, once or twice a week, Mrs. Bazak has contact with the school authorities and attends parent and teachers' meetings.

Are the children now becoming normal in that they no longer have the desire to roam the streets, to steal, to smoke or to use foul language and can have relationships in the usual manner with youth in general? Not entirely.

But their attachment to the club and their youth leader, and their trust in the social worker, has to some extent curbed them. They realize that if they go out in public with Haim, their leader, on buses or to a cinema, misbehaviour on their part would embarrass him.

This trust can have some curious effects, for some of the children might even come and boast of a thieving exploit, since they had come to feel that the people connected with the club had no connection with the courts and could not expose them to the police.

This trustful feeling vis-a-vis their standing with the police has taken some time to bloom. At first they felt as if Haim Rokach and Mrs. Bazak were working in collusion with the police — in fact reporting their misdeeds. Then they gradually began to feel that even if they were called to court it would help them if Mrs. Bazak were to be present.

The project looks as if it could offer the ideal solution to this particular problem if it is continued long enough. Some children have improved completely and can be sent to normal youth clubs. Others still need to be helped and some will have to be sent to institutions.

But there seems to be no doubt that for children who fall into bad ways and for whom there is a hope of curing — this is the way.

WHY PIUS KEPT SILENT

"Pius XII And The Third Reich: A Documentation", by Saul Friedländer, reviewed by Gordon C. Zahn, Professor of Sociology at Loyola University; in the Congress Bi-Weekly

When Paul VI revealed that he was "pairing" the preliminaries leading to the canonization of his immediate predecessor, John XXIII, with a similar move toward the canonization of Pius XII, the announcement provoked surprise and even consternation in many quarters. In recent years, the stock of the latter — a revered man in his lifetime — has fallen sharply.

This is explained in part by the tremendous contrasts in personality between Pius and the universally beloved "good Pope John." A more immediate cause of the change in attitude, however, is found in the controversy that has raged over his failure (or better, refusal) to denounce publicly Hitler's infamous "Final Solution of the Jewish Question."

This reviewer has been among those who have criticized the papal decision. At the same time, I have criticized the Hochhuth thesis which would reduce that decision to proof of unconcern or cold indifference on the part of a Pope who was more concerned with being a diplomat than with being a human being. Such superficialities do justice to neither the man nor the issue.

Intended or not, Friedländer's "documentation" is of immense value in that it can serve as a corrective to the more extreme attacks mounted against Pius XII. If nothing else, the Pope we find in these pages was at least a man sorely troubled by the awful events that were taking place and by what he felt (rightly or wrongly is still open to debate!) was his own state of total helplessness in the face of such concentrated evil.

This is not to say, of course, that Friedländer accepts or justifies the Pope's refusal to speak out — his own memory of losing both parents at Auschwitz would make a truly dispassionate review of the events impossible if not, indeed, unnatural — but the facts he presents can furnish a more reliable basis for reaching a balanced judgment of the papal "failure" than would be possible without them.

There are inherent weaknesses in the Friedländer documentation, and he is frank about admitting them. For one thing, the necessary reliance upon the material in German state archives, especially reports submitted to the Foreign Office, make the findings vulnerable to whatever defects or distortions their authors put into them. This is always a problem in the analysis of state documents, but it is greatly enhanced when we take the special nature of the totalitarian Nazi regime into account.

The German diplomat assigned to the Vatican undoubtedly exaggerated favorable developments and played down their setbacks so that, it may be assumed, the Pope and his Curia appear here in a much more "pro-Axis" stance than might actually have been the case.

This reviewer was particularly impressed by this possibility when he read the occasional references to the extremely harsh criticisms supposedly directed against the Pope by the Archbishop of New York. It is difficult to reconcile this with the close personal relationship that obtained between Cardinal Spellman and the Pope at the time and which has grown into a kind of veneration on the former's part since the death of Pius XII.

One hopes that the recent decision on the part of the Vatican to publish its own documents bearing upon this period will lead to a fuller clarification of this most crucial issue; to this point, it should be noted, the items that have been released have not refuted the essential points made by the more balanced of the papal critics.

Friedländer's own analysis of his documentation places major stress on two factors as accounting for the papal restraint.

They are, first, the Pope's personal attachment for Germany and the German people tracing back to his years of service as Nuncio to Bavaria; and, second, his all-consuming opposition to "Bolshevism," which caused him to view with misgivings the prospect of a total German collapse that would remove a bulwark against the spread of Communist influence in Europe.

As to the former, there can be no question; nor, however, can one seriously fault a man for developing a favorable attitude toward a nation in which he had spent many pleasant years and had formed many close friendships.

As to the second, which would seem to imply a readiness to accept even a Hitler as a "lesser evil," there is more room for serious question.

Certainly there was a strong strain of inflexible anti-Communism in the Pope's thinking — and in this, the long tradition of Catholic opposition to the atheist and materialist bases of Marxism was undoubtedly strengthened by Pacelli's own bitter recollections of the short-lived Bavarian experiment and the more recent sufferings visited upon his Church in Mexico and Spain.

Despite this, there is clear evidence that neither his affection for the German people nor his fixed opposition to Communism blinded him to the evils of Nazism. Quite the contrary. Recent historical research has established that he was personally involved in Vatican efforts aimed at assisting the German resistance in its efforts to overthrow Hitler.

True, in this he undoubtedly felt himself restricted by his concern for the wellbeing of the Catholics (and, of course, the Church as an institution) in Germany and the occupied territories. Perhaps Friedländer's analysis could have given more weight to the part this must have played in the papal calculation.

One might still argue, as this reviewer has, that too much weight was given to these "prudential" considerations; but this must not obscure the fact that these were legitimate concerns that would have to be taken into account by any Pope charged with such terrible responsibilities.

One last factor that must be given greater recognition than it receives in this documentation or, for that matter, in most treatments of this issue: Pius XII was deeply committed to the cause of international peace, a fact that was made clear in all his public declarations.

This commitment would make it a matter of utmost importance for him to preserve enough of a position of neutrality to keep alive some possibility, however remote, that he might serve to bring an end to the monstrous war which, in his eyes, may have constituted a greater evil than the spread of Communism — or even the horror of the extermination camps.

If this was the case, and I suspect it was, the papal opposition to the murderous bombings of German cities and his impatience with the "unconditional surrender" objective of the Allies take on a different coloration than they find in the German diplomatic reports presenting them as renewed manifestations of the Pope's "friendliness" toward Germany and her cause.

It is permissible to argue with this order of priorities, but it cannot be ignored or dismissed. It is possible that the principal reason for the refusal to denounce the Nazi crimes may be found here.

For such a public break with the Axis would have killed all chances for mediation on the Pope's part. Besides, there would be every reason to assume that his intervention would not have the desired effect anyway.

Before we write off this pessimism as an excess of prudence or a faintness of heart, it would be well to reflect upon the fact that his protests on the other issues were openly disregarded by the leaders of the "democratic" world (and by his Catholic flock and its leaders in those nations as well!). What possible basis could he have, then, for expecting his words to have greater impact upon the policies and programs of the avowed enemies of Christianity in Berlin?

In short, Friedländer's book can give us a deeper understanding of a most sensitive historical problem; but it does not answer all the crucial questions. Nor, I should add, does its author suggest that it does. The debate will, and must, continue. What we have here is an extremely valuable source that the future discussants will have to take into account.

Vincent Massey Dedicates Hall At Hebrew U. In His Name

The Rt. Hon. Vincent Massey, P.C., C.H., (Companion of Honour) first Canadian Governor General of Canada, dedicated a hall contributed in his name to the Jewish National and University Library of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, Mr. Massey, on a yachting cruise in the Mediterranean, crossed into Israel Jerusalem at the Mandelbaum Gate earlier in the day from Jordan.

Accompanying Mr. Massey were Louis Rogers, Canadian Ambassador to Israel, and Mr. Massey's party of Canadian friends on the Mediterranean cruise: Mme de Gaspe Beaubien, wife of Senator Louis de Gaspe Beaubien; Professor of Philosophy Thomas Henderson, McGill University; Mr. and Mrs. Murray Vaughan; Col. Alexander Parker; and Brigadier and Mrs. Aird Nesbitt. After cruising in the Greek Archipelago, the party had visited several Arab countries before arriving in Israel for a two-day stay.

Prior to the dedicatory ceremony at the Hebrew University, a sizeable number of Canadian and Canadian-born faculty members and students met with Mr. Massey, Governor General of Canada, from 1952 to 1959. In the welcoming party was also Canadian-born Dr. Dov Joseph, former Israel Minister of Justice.

On behalf of the Hebrew University, Dr. Bernard Cherrick, executive vice-president, welcomed Mr. Massey, pointing out the University's close ties with Canada. Dr. Curt Wormann, director of the Jewish National and University Library, briefed the guests on the 1½ million volume library, and explained details of a specially arranged exhibition of books and documents relating to Canada, including an atlas of Canada from 1639.

At the dedicatory ceremony, Canadian-born E. E. Gelber, member of the University's Board of Governors, paid tribute to Mr. Massey and the profound influence made by the Massey family in Canada. "We are proud and happy that a man of Vincent Massey's stature has allowed his name to be linked with the Library," Mr. Gelber added.

In his reply after unveiling the dedicatory plaque, Mr. Massey said that he was very moved by the occasion and that it was with the greatest pleasure that he was visiting the Hebrew University, something he had wanted to do for a long time. He ended his remarks by wishing "prosperity and success to the University and the country to which it belongs."

Mr. Massey and his party departed for Cyprus to continue their yachting cruise before returning to Canada.

ISRAEL REASSURES U.S. AIDES

nations guessing whether she is developing or intends to develop an atomic bomb. The proclaimed policy of the Israeli Government is to restrict the development of atomic energy to peaceful purposes, but American officials believe that Israel deliberately maintains the Dimona plant to give her the option of developing an atomic deterrent against the Arab nations.

In the opinion of some Israeli officials, the uncertainty over Israeli intentions provides a more effective deterrent than if Israel actually proceeded to develop and explode an atomic bomb.

The latter step, it is argued, might provoke an attack by the numerically superior Arab forces, as has already been threatened by President Gamal Abdel Nasser of the United Arab Republic.

But as long as the Arab nations are uncertain how far Israel has progressed, the argument continues, says the New York Times, and they will be deterred by the uncertainty and have no excuse to start an attack.
